Summary

This monograph attempts to draw the attention of the people of Southern Africa, particularly those in Botswana, Mozambique and Zimbabwe, to one of the biggest problems the region is facing today, that of uncontrolled veld fires. The monograph recognises that the Southern African region is endowed with a lot of natural resources and that those resources are our heritage. It also acknowledges the role played by the different governments in attempting to safeguard those resources for the benefit of present and future generations. It further discusses the causes of these uncontrolled fires, and their impact on humans, on the environment, on the atmosphere, on national parks and wildlife, on sacred places and on economic activities. The monograph ends by pointing out what people should or should not do if they are to prevent uncontrolled fire outbreaks as well as what action to take to bring fire under control once it breaks out. In short, the monograph educates people about the dangers of causing fires because fires destroy the environment and all life in it.
